

Rhys Morton T1A2 Portfolio

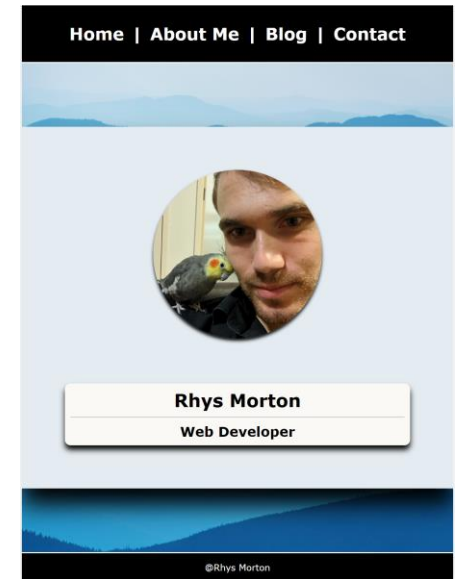

Slide deck

Home Page

I kept my design as minimalistic as I could and that's what I like.

Just a simple home page with a picture of me and an introduction.

Nav bar resized according to screen size. For desktop version, the buttons do animate by slowly increasing in size when hovered over.

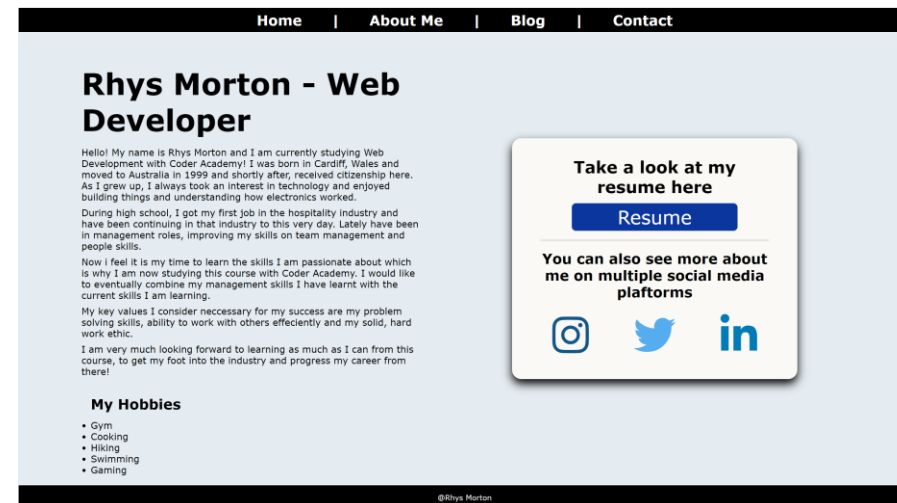

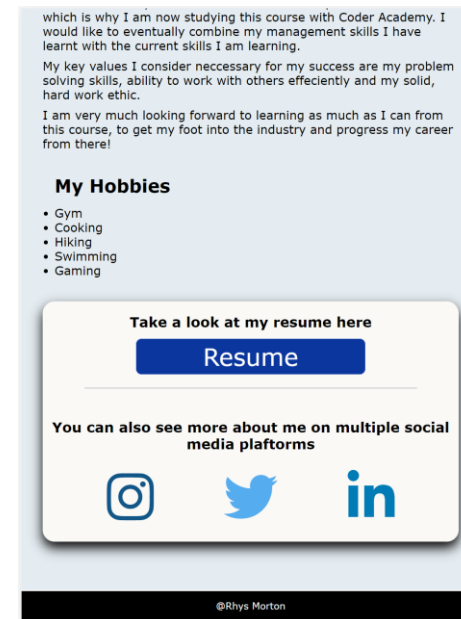

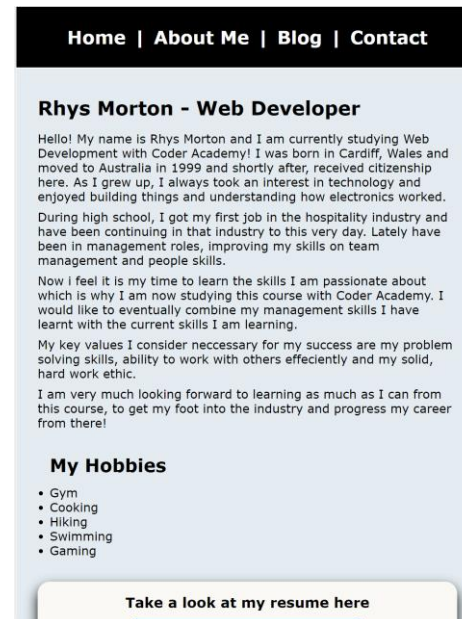

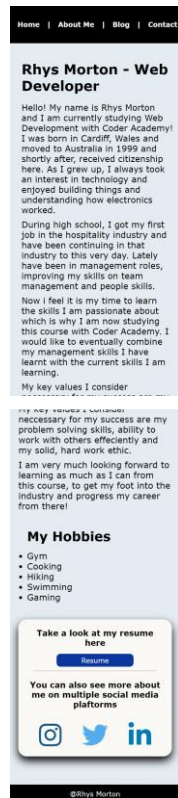

About Me Page

This page contains information about myself, a link to my resume and social media platforms.

The social media icons were brought in using 'font awesome'.

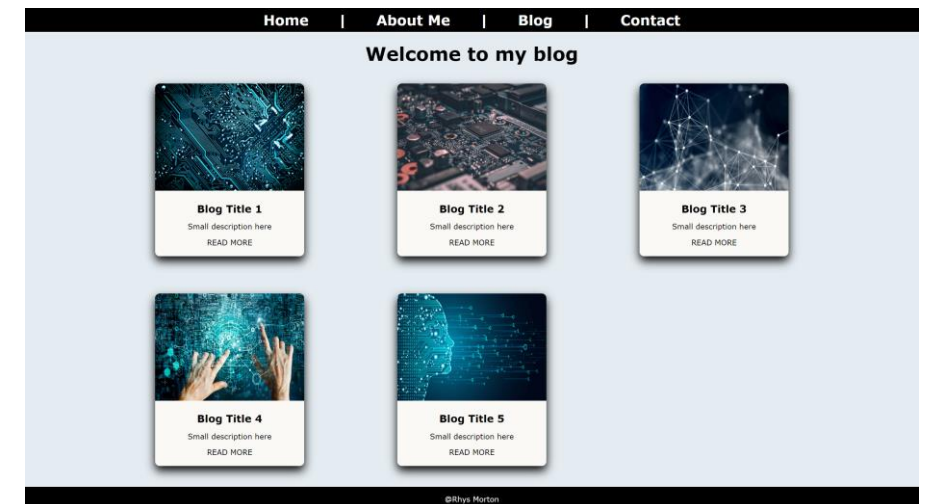

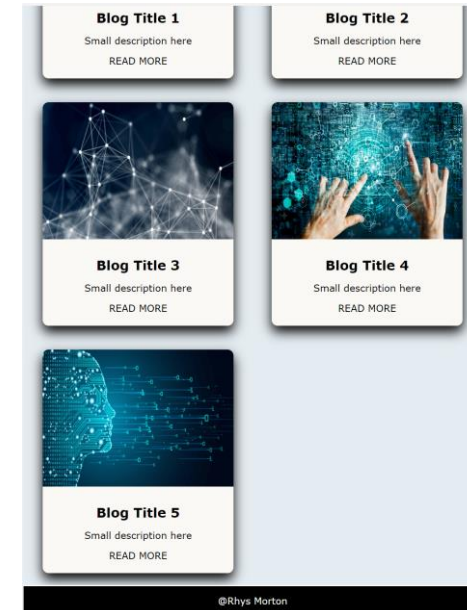

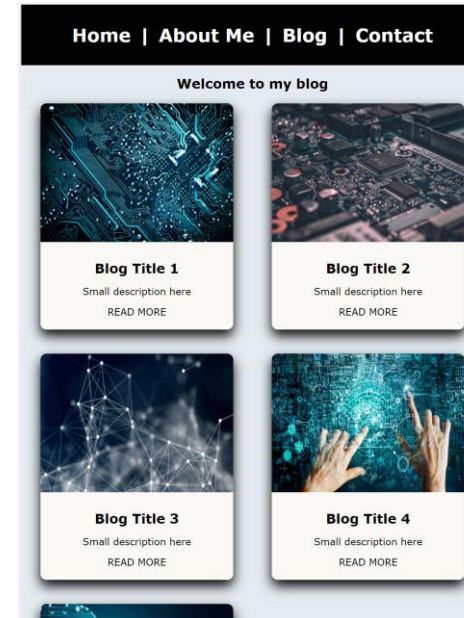

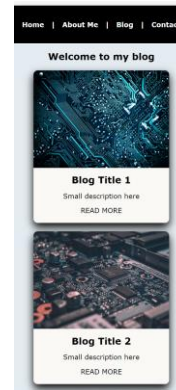

For the desktop sizing, I thought it would be different to put the resume/social media box to the side.

Blog Front Page

This is the blog front page with titles and a link for five blogs. I am quite pleased with the design of each blog element.

Using flexbox each element is orientated differently depending on the screen size.

Blog Article Page

This is one of the blog article pages that you are taken to when clicking 'READ MORE' in the blog front page. There are 5 of these however only the image and the random placeholder text is different, not the layout.

For tablet and desktop size, I decided to go with a wrap around layout for the text and the image.

Contact Me Page

This page contains some contact information. For the sake of this assignment, the details are just fake ones. The icons once again were brought in using 'Font Awesome'.

And a form is used to allow the user to input name and email and submit that information. After clicking submit, nothing happens but visually it works.

Wireframes

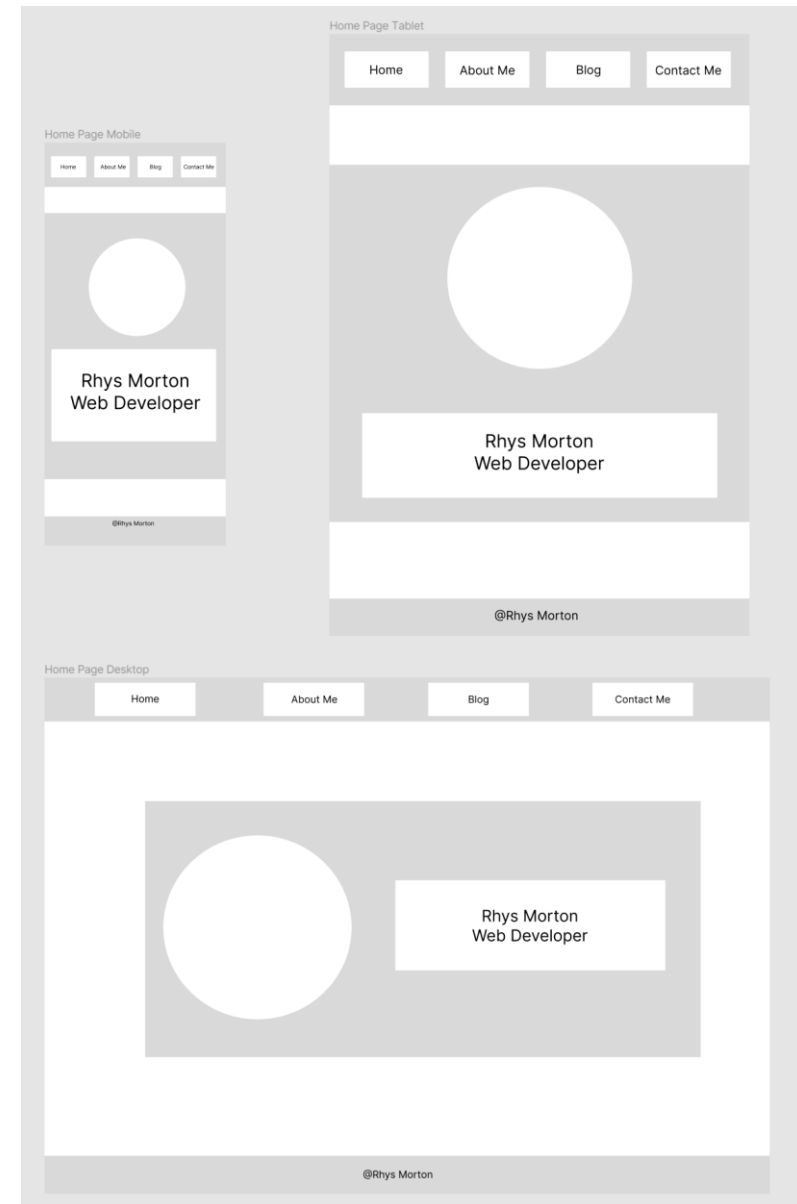

I struggled to visualise how my portfolio would look in the end, so I went with very basic wireframes, without adding too much detail as all I wanted to do was get the structure relatively visualised.

Some changes were made in the development process but I decided to keep these wireframes how I originally made them.

Home Page Wireframe

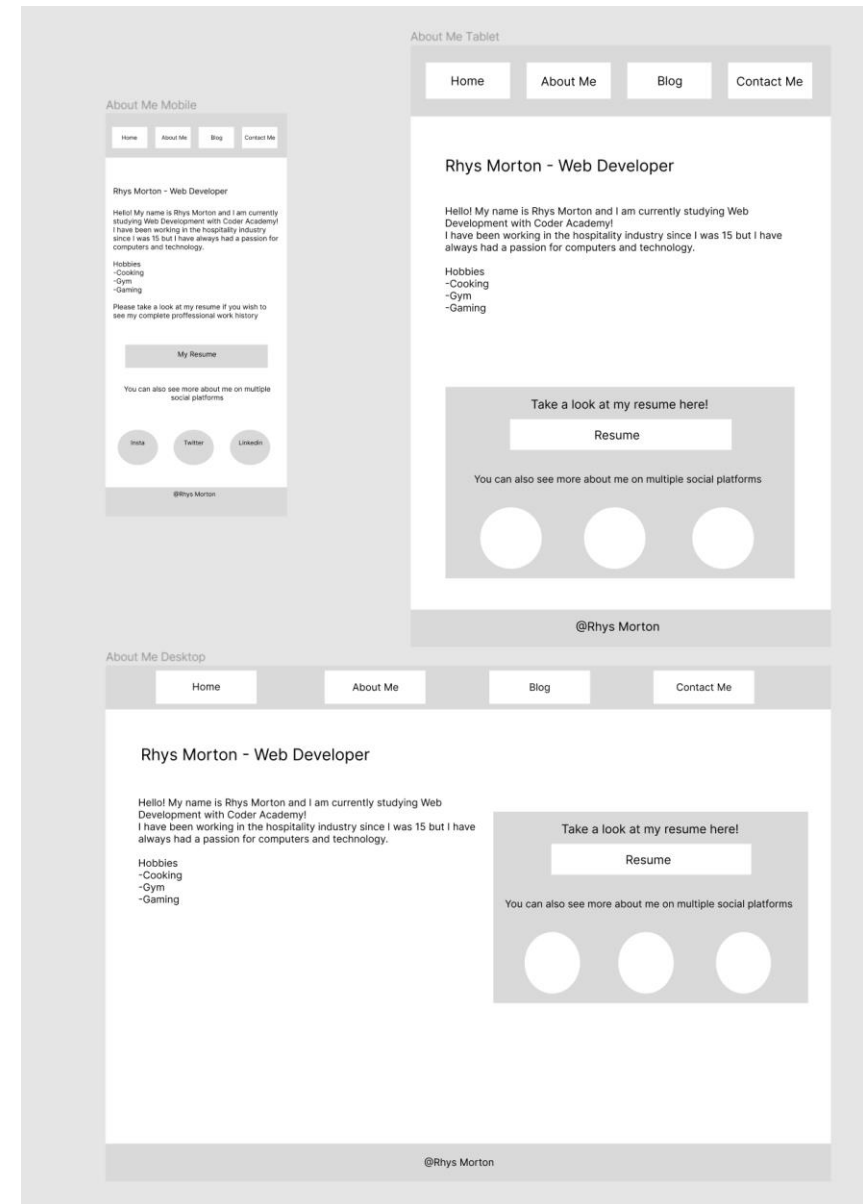

I didn't change too much with this page. I knew I wanted a nice background image for at least this page which is what I went for.

About Me Wireframe

Some styling was changed with this page. With the resume/social box, the mobile and tablet versions had a background colour go completely across the screen instead of the bubble for the desktop version.

I did add much more information about myself later in the development process, so the desktop version does not look so empty either.

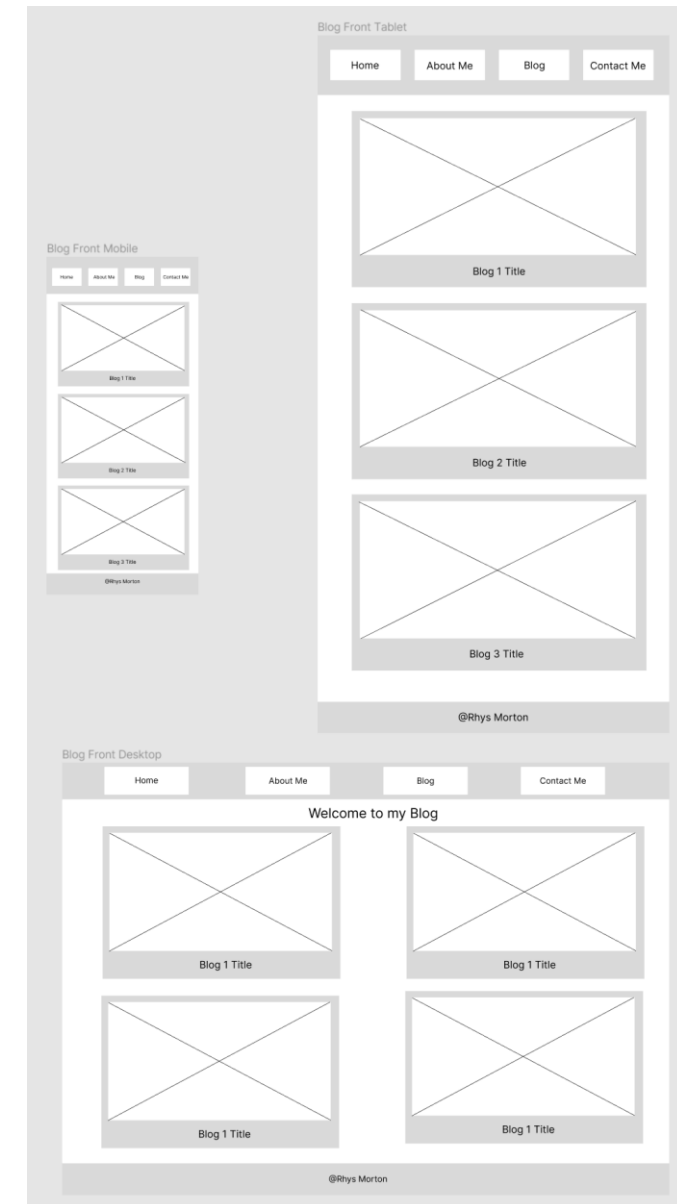

Blog Front Wireframe

This page took me a fair amount of time to make it look like something I liked. I knew I wanted individual elements with an image and title.

I ended up adding a small description and a 'READ MORE' as a link below the title and cleaned up the element in the final design.

In the end I am now quite pleased with how this page turned out.

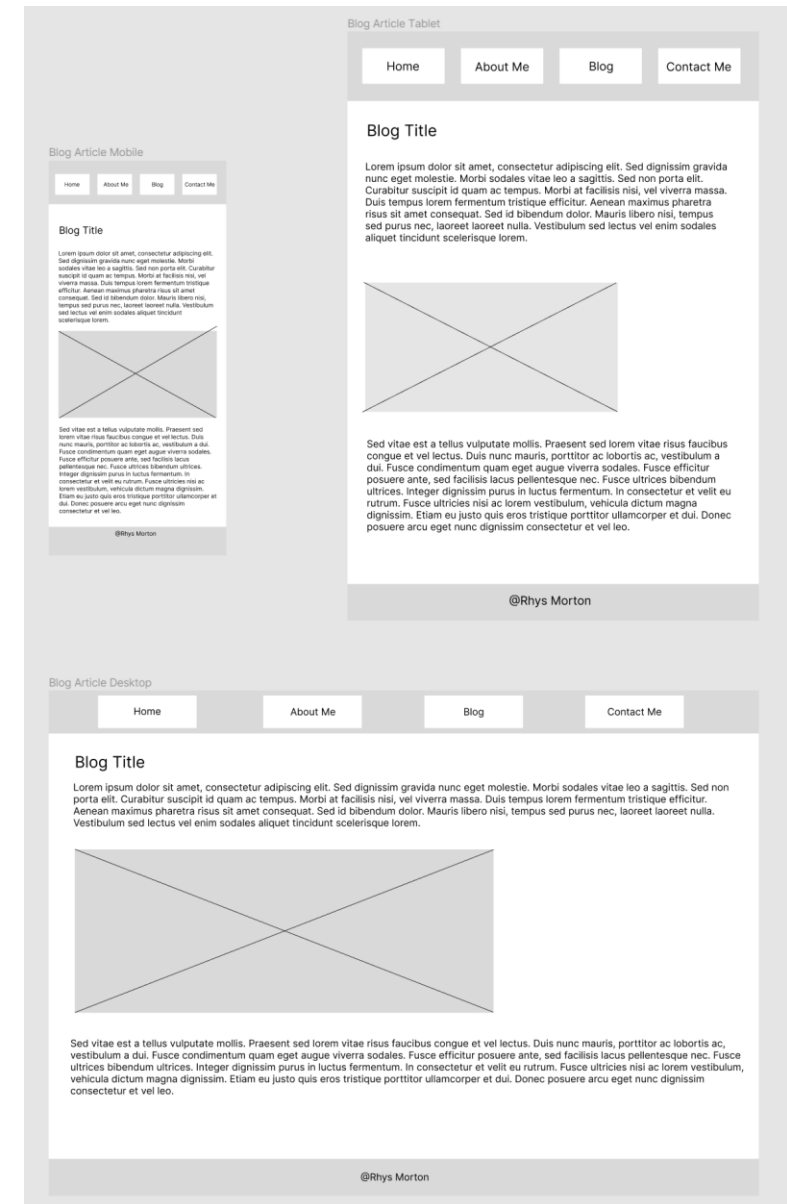

Blog Article Wireframe

This page got a few changed as I went through the development process.

For tablet and desktop sizing, I decided to go with a text wrap around effect with the images. Much less empty space.

I also found that it doesn't look great to have the article spread completely across desktop screens, so I shrunk with width of the article and put borders on the side to make it look nice.

Contact Me Wireframe

This page didn't change much from the original wireframe.

Similar to the design of the 'About Me' page, where the sign-up form for mobile and tablet sizing got a background colour the spread across the screen where the desktop got a bubble to the side.

Conclusion

I really enjoyed the whole process of creating this website. Multiple challenges of course, such as figuring out flexbox, even though I thought I knew how to use it already. Colour design was actually a bit of an experiment until I got what I liked.

There are other ways I feel I could design this portfolio that I feel I might like better looking back at it, however I am pleased with the result for now.
